An Anglo-Indian teak trunk with provenance to Lt. Colonel Alexander Caldwell who commanded the artillery for Wellington at Seringapatam in the defeat of Tippoo Sultan.

The trunk is well made with its earlier age showing its quality. The top has a moulded edge and the bracket feet are nicely shaped. The thick, raised brass strap work to the edges are shaped decoratively to the ends. The attention to detail is such that they extend through the plinth base to support the base boards of the trunk. The parts of the straps are normally unseen and have taken on a verdigris colour. The brass carrying handles to the sides are a good size and chunky. The main body of the trunk has a raised lip to its interior edge to fit the rebated edge to the lid. The top of the trunk can be fully opened to sit horizontally, held in place by long brass hinges. The trunk has a brass hasp lock that fits to a square escutcheon plate. There is a patch below this and marks above that suggest at some point there was an additional lock fitting. The top of the trunk has an oval plate which is engraved Lt. Col. Alex.r Caldwell Artillery No. 2.

The owner of this trunk had a rich military history and was heavily involved in many of the battles that cemented British rule in India. Items belonging to soldiers that fought at Seringapatam do not come on the market often. Aside from the trunk's exciting provenance it is also a very practical piece of furniture not only offering good storage space but being a very commercial size. Circa 1815.

Lieutenant Colonel Cadwell

Alexander Caldwell had a very distinguished career as a soldier in India helping the British to take control of the country and push the French out. He is not to be confused with his nephew James Caldwell who was also at Seringapatam and was a contemporary of Lachlan Macquarie, the famed Governor of New South Wales. Alexander was appointed a cadet of the Honourable East India Company's Bengal Presidency in 1782 at the age of 19. His first year was spent at Woolwich training for the artillery before he departed for Calcutta where he was appointed Lieutenant Fire-worker and was garrisoned until he was sent to Dacca in 1787. He rose steadily through the ranks, sometime gaining his promotions whilst back in England on sick leave.

In 1793 he volunteered to accompany the artillery to the Coromandel coast with the army led by Lord Cornwallis. In 1796, after promotion to Captain in the January, he fought with his company at Hyderabad against a French force in the Nizam's territory. In 1798 he joined General Harris' army for the war against Tippoo Sultan of Mysore. This included the battle of Malavilly in March 1799 and the Tope near Seringapatam where he received Arthur Wellesley's thanks for his command of the artillery. He helped spike the guns on the glacis of Seringapatam with Colonel Campbell of the 74th and then served in the batteries for the whole of the siege on the Tiger of Mysore's stronghold. He was also involved in the assault of the fort and was present at the surrender. After Seringapatam he was put in command of the artillery attached to Colonel Bowser's force that was tasked with taking the forts of Gurumcondah, Hurrial and Gooty. Aside from commanding the art...
